Should this "case study" be part of your methodology, or is it maybe a more integral part of your research? It seems a little out of place to be mentioned here.

Ah, excuse me, I see, the requirements feed into the prototype, which is still methodology. This is somewhat confusing, or a little elaborate for a methodology I feel like

Nice that you boilerplated your thesis without distracting me with dummy text. Looks clear and concise what your aim is

What does this mean?

Are you measuring occupants (as you mention location and frequency, as viewed from an occupant) or occupancy (as viewed from the perspective of "the building" or certain rooms)

*I understand your questionnaire measures this, but what is the intended purpose

Can you maybe estimate or show possible ranges/distributions?

Really nice you already have a few requirements, but is this still "methodology" or already some preliminary results?

Was it evaluated? Or will it be evaluated? It seems a little vague as to what the temporal status of this draft is. There is both placeholder/templating for coming information, but language used to describe past events.

Compliment

Well written and clear overview of the methods used. Clearly describes the set-up of the survey (structured) and the evaluation interviews (semi-structured) and supports this by previous studies. The methodology outlines the interview set-up in detail. Also includes justification for encouraging participants to think aloud during usability testing.

I do wonder how you have guaranteed the diversity of the participants.

Well done!
